Why?

To develop and refine your observation and photography skills by looking more closely at things around you that you see and experience every day, and to experiment with editing techniques.

It is the aim of many photographers to show not just what a place, person or object looked like, but also what it felt like to be there. It can be a challenge to convey the senses of seeing, listening, tasting, smelling, and touching through a photo, but by taking some time and thought as to how you can heighten the viewer's senses, you can transport someone to a different place and time through your images. By using and focussing on your five senses, you will also begin to notice important details which are often overlooked, from the sound of a repetitive dripping tap, to the smell of the air outside when it has just rained.

Touch - Frozen

Mo Devlin

Mesmerizing Photos of Frozen Flowers by Mo Devlin

When you hear the term flower photography, it probably doesn't inspire a particularly powerful reaction. There are plenty of gorgeous images of flowers

Devlin experiments with different flowers, he sometimes dyes the flowers using food colouring and uses boiled water, tap water and distilled water. All with varying results. He considers where the light is and take close up images of the bubbles that are created.

Your is to freeze some objects in various containers and take a series of photographs using your phone/camera (whatever you have access to)

These should be presented on canva and to submit your work you should share the design with LRelf@fulstonmanor.kent.sch.uk

Please let me know if you have any issues.
